

Soft Skills

Soft skills are one of the most important tool in the industry today. Applicants should know how to communicate clearly, take initiative, solve problems, team work and get along with co-worker. From making a small talk with customers, to coordinating a project across several departments on a tight deadline. These straits are often called as soft skills.

All these straits would differentiate between a standout employee and one who just gets by. Demand critical thinking, empathy or other abilities that computers can't easily simulate. The Job market's most sought after skills can be tough to spot on a resume. It's really easy to teach someone how to slice and dice onions, teach how to cook but really hard to teach someone basic manners and work ethics.

To determine the most sought after soft skills. The ability to communicate trumped all else, followed by organization, capacity for teamwork, punctuality, critical thinking, social savvy, creativity & adaptability. A restaurant owner recently put a sign outside seeking workers with "common sense."
